

Quick Tip #25 Don't Delete Your Work, Do This Instead! - 2:5...

Tue, 2/9 8:41PM 3:29

SUMMARY KEYWORDS

deleted, writing, angie, quick tip, work, episode, document, l'oreal, week, sunday, podcast, song lyric, misspellings, line, google docs, calls, grammarly, reference, full length, article

SPEAKERS

Jessica Lauren

J Jessica Lauren 00:00
Hey y'all. Hey, it's sugar Jessica Lauren and I am coming to you with this week's quick tip. So this past Sunday and episode number one on AI we were talking about how to come up with good ideas. Check it out. So today's quick tip is for my writers, my people that are out there writing blogs writing scripts for podcast, a screenwriter, whoever you are, if you write on a regular this bad baby is for you. So one day, I was on Twitter man and everybody else's business and my good girl L'Oreal Thompson paint and she retweeted the author Angie Thomas, Angie Thomas is the author of the hate to give and concrete rolls and it basically says writing tip have a document called deleted parts. Anytime you're writing or editing and deleted line, put it there, you may find a way to use it later. And that is the most genius thing I've ever heard. So I typically write in Google Docs, right? And then I copy and paste it and put it in grammerly and then Grammarly is where I do all of my editing. Right. So you know, Grammarly shows you all the misspellings or what you need to rephrase because the final exam, right? All That Jazz, right? So that is also where I chop and screw everything right, I cut things out, and I delete them. But I'm like, you know what, Angie, you're right, saving some of those deleted parts. And going back to it could be of such a big service because maybe that line didn't work in that particular article or podcast outline or whatever. But it's still a really good line. So do not delete your deleted parts. Be sure to save them somewhere else in a different document. L'Oreal says that she calls hers cuts. And then she inserts the documents name. So let's say for today's episodes, my might say cuts, Quick Tip Number 25 or whatever. And that's where she leaves on her deleted stuff. But if you want you can do it. Angie doesn't just has a whole deleted document like listen, this is where all the trash goes. And everyone will sift through it and see like, Oh, you know what that line is actually good. I was just in a weird space. I was tired or it didn't work for that particular article or, you know, screenplay or whatever you're writing. But it could work here. It could go in this poem, or it could go in a song lyric or now I'm in a different space and can expound on it. So please do not delete your work, save it somewhere else, and let it work for you in the future. All right, you are that's all I have for today's quick tip. Thank you so much, L'Oreal and Miss Angie Thomas for inspiring today's episode. I am definitely going to implement it like that instead of deleting stuff or leaving it kind of all kind of ways on grammerly. Maybe it's going somewhere sacred because my work is sacred. Okay, even the stuff that didn't make the cut. Okay, so thank you guys so much for tuning in. Be sure to check out the Sunday jumpstart.com. In case I reference anything that you want to click on and link and reference and get. Be sure to follow on Instagram at the Sundays. I'm sorry, an app will be back here this week with a full length episode on Sunday. All right, you guys finish the rest of this week start. I hope you're making amazing content are out there. All right. Bye.